Judge Walker of the district court has just decided the important case of R. J. Adams (of Dallas) vs. the H. & T. C. Ry. Co., the full statement of facts which the public are anxious to know, he has decided the land used for at the time of the location thereof by Adams & Leonard was not vacant, unappropriated public domain, the same having been appropriated by surveys previously made, by virtue of valid certificates in the land office, and that the surveys of the district court, made by mistake upon located land and transferred to the second set of field notes in June 1873 were not void by reason of the fact that the certificates were not withdrawn from the land office and then returned with the new field notes in the land office. The irregularity in the surveys was cured by article 3,921, Revised Statutes, September 1, 1879, before the inception of the claim of the plaintiff. The surveys of the defendant upon the land in controversy are held to be valid, and judgment will be rendered for the defendant.

The Evening Times contains the following concerning a young man well-known in telegraph circles: C. A. Davis is a young man who has for some time manifested a special interest in Colorado City, but he no longer manipulates. He fell among bad company, very bad company, and the variety show people, with whom he riotously blew away his substance, and on Saturday found himself dead, cruce and despoiled among men and women, especially the variety women. There being a full of his body to the company where he could lay violent hands on it, Davis concluded to attempt his recovery to that amount, and seek a chance of recovery. His departure and also that of the money soon he was known to the powers above him and the first work of his successor was to telegraph to the officers of Dallas and elsewhere to intercept him. The telegram reached here too late, Davis and Diamond Whitlock, a variety actress and his Delilah, having passed through the day before over the Texas & Pacific. This information was telegraphed to Colorado City, and the officers of Houston, New Orleans and Galveston were immediately wired to be on the alert. Nothing was heard of him since. The woman who went with him and who was the cause of his going wrong, once made the night hideous by her howling in the Lipton theater, in this city, and she has a sister who still remains to make people in the vicinity of the theater want to suicide.
